The underside of a lily pad looks vastly different than the top. A system of stems and tubes run underneath the lily pad. These tubes, which are connected to openings called stomas in the top of the leaves, help the pad float and collect oxygen through the stoma. This oxygen is transferred to the water lily's stem and down to the plant's roots.

Lily pads are frequently appreciated for decorative purposes, but occasionally, the lily pad population in a pond or lake can explode. If over half the water is covered by the pads, you may have a problem on your hands. Lily pads can either be removed physically or chemically, but both methods can be time consuming.
